GUIDE NO. 06

What to ask before you buy in a gated community

Who runs a master-planned community, what it costs each year, what the rules are, and the two papers the law says you get.

How to use this guide

Read this guide once from start to finish. Then use the worksheet at the end for each house you look at.

Every community has its own documents, and the rules in them change. Each part of this guide says where its facts come from. Before you count on them for one house, read that community's own documents.

Inside this guide

01 Who runs a gated community

02 The dues, the budget and the reserves

03 The district's line on the tax bill

04 The rules

05 Two papers the law gives you

06 Getting the documents, in order

07 Your notes for one house behind a gate

As you read, keep coming back to three questions

1. Who runs the place, and what does each one charge?
2. What do the rules say about how I'd live here?
3. What will I owe on the day I close?

01

Who runs a gated community

Behind the gate, there's usually an association, and often a district too. Each one charges you. Here's what each one does.

Picture the gate, the clubhouse, the lake and the rows of houses. Someone built all of it. Someone keeps it up. And someone decides what color you can paint your front door.

Most of Lakewood Ranch sits inside homeowners associations, and so do many neighborhoods in Sarasota and Bradenton. People say HOA. An HOA is a private group of the owners, set up under Florida law. It charges dues and makes rules. It approves changes to your home, and it can fine you for breaking a rule.

Many of these places also sit inside a community development district. People say CDD. It's a unit of local government. It borrowed money to build the roads, lakes and pipes. It charges each lot on the property tax bill to pay that back and to keep things up.

The county is the third body. It sets your property taxes by the value of the house. The district's charge is on that same bill. The association's dues never do.

You can learn about both before you make an offer. Here's what to ask for.

FIG. 01 · WHO DECIDES WHAT

The association and the district answer different questions

Read each side. The association sets how you live here. The district charges for the roads and lakes it built.

THE ASSOCIATION DECIDES

How you live here

- The dues, and any special assessment
- The rules: rentals, parking, paint, fences, pets
- Whether a change to your home is approved
- Fines, after notice and a hearing

THE DISTRICT DECIDES

What the roads and lakes cost

1. The debt line on the tax bill, for the bonds that built the place
2. The maintenance line, set each year
3. The upkeep of the roads, lakes and gates it built

Not every community has a CDD. The tax bill tells you whether there is one.

02

The dues, the budget and the reserves

The dues are the first number you'll hear. The budget and the reserves tell you whether the dues are likely to go up.

Ask the HOA for this year's budget. Florida law says it must show the year's expected income and spending, and what's left over or short at year end. Florida law calls the dues assessments. Every owner must pay them. Unpaid dues can become a lien on the home.

RESERVES

Money set aside each year for big repairs later: the clubhouse roof, the roads, the pool. An HOA's budget may include reserves, but it doesn't have to. And the owners can vote to set aside less, or nothing.

Source: Florida Statutes 720.303 (2026), association powers, official records, the budget and the financial report

A community that skips its reserves will ask for the money later. That's called a special assessment. It can be large, and it can come with little warning.

Ask for the last financial report too. Florida law sets what it must contain, based on the HOA's size. The biggest ones must have audited statements.

Ask for the reserve study, if there is one. Read it next to the budget. Are the reserves it calls for being funded?

FIG. 02 · THREE NUMBERS

The dues, the reserves and the special assessment

Each card is one number to find. Only the first one is required by law.

1

THE DUES

What every owner pays the association, usually monthly or quarterly. The law calls them assessments.

DOES THE LAW REQUIRE IT?

- ✓ Yes. Every member must pay, and unpaid dues can become a lien

WHERE TO FIND IT

This year's budget, and the disclosure summary

2

THE RESERVES

Money set aside each year for big repairs later: the roads, the clubhouse roof, the pool.

DOES THE LAW REQUIRE IT?

- ⊖ No. The budget may include them, and the owners can vote to set aside less

WHERE TO FIND IT

The budget's reserve lines, and the reserve study if there is one

3

THE SPECIAL ASSESSMENT

A one-time charge when the dues and the reserves don't cover a cost.

DOES THE LAW REQUIRE IT?

- ⊖ No. The association levies one when it needs to

WHERE TO FIND IT

The estoppel certificate lists any that has been levied

Dues can change from year to year. The disclosure summary you get before signing says so in capital letters.

03

The district's line on the tax bill

If the community has a CDD, its charge is on the property tax bill, not in the dues. Pull the bill for the exact parcel.

A CDD collects its charge with the property taxes. It sits in the part of the bill called non-ad valorem assessments. That means it isn't based on the value of your house. It's a set amount for your lot.

There are two lines. The debt line pays back the bonds that built the roads and lakes. The maintenance line pays for upkeep, and it's set each year. When the bonds are paid off, the debt line reads zero. The maintenance line goes on.

Paying off your mortgage doesn't touch either line. The charge stays with the lot. If it isn't paid, it can become a lien on the home.

Both counties let you look up a bill online. Find the parcel, then read the district's name beside each line.

The August notice from the property appraiser is a preview of the next bill. It's called the TRIM notice. In Sarasota County it shows the proposed district charges too.

The rules

Read the covenants and the rules early. They decide what you can do with the house.

Every HOA has a declaration of covenants. Those are the promises recorded with the county that bind every lot. People call them the covenants. Under them sit the day-to-day rules and, often, a homeowners' manual.

The rules reach further than people expect. One Lakewood Ranch village doesn't allow a truck to park in a driveway overnight. The same village doesn't allow short-term rentals, and its shortest lease is six months. Some of its neighborhoods require a full year.

Most changes to the outside of a home there need approval first. Paint colors, fences, a pool, a shed. Florida law limits what the HOA can enforce. The standard must be in the covenants or the published rules, or reasonably follow from them. If it says no, it must tell you which rule, and what part of your plan fails.

Florida law also protects a few things. An HOA can't stop you keeping items that can't be seen from the street, a neighbor's lot, a common area or a golf course. And it can't make you ask before you change the inside of your home, as long as the change can't be seen from outside.

Rentals have a special rule. A new limit on renting applies only to owners who buy after it passes, or who agree to it. But limits on rentals shorter than six months, or more than three times a year, apply to everyone.

If you break a rule, the HOA can fine you. It must give you 14 days' notice and a chance for a hearing first. It can't fine you for garbage cans at the curb within a day of pickup.

FIG. 04 · THE RULES

Seven things to look for in the rules

Read the covenants, the rules and the manual for each one. Write down what you find.

- ☐ 01 Rentals
  The shortest lease allowed, how many times a year, and whether the tenant needs approval.
- ☐ 02 Parking
  Where trucks, boats, trailers and campers can park, and when.
- ☐ 03 Fences and pools
  Whether they're allowed, and how high a fence can be.
- ☐ 04 Paint and the outside of the house
  Approved colors, roofs, yard lamps, and what needs approval first.
- ☐ 05 Pets
  How many, and any limits by size or kind.
- ☐ 06 Yards and watering
  Lawn standards, trees, and watering days.
- ☐ 07 Fines and how they work
  The notice, the hearing, and what a fine can grow to.

The village rules named above are examples from one Lakewood Ranch manual. Every community has its own.

Two papers the law gives you

Florida gives a buyer two papers in a community with an HOA. One comes before you sign. The other comes before you close.

Before you sign a contract, the seller must give you a disclosure summary. It says you'll have to join the HOA and pay its dues. It says the amounts can change. It warns that a city, county or special district may charge you too, and that unpaid dues can become a lien.

If you don't get it before you sign, you can cancel. You have 3 days after you finally get it, or until closing, whichever comes first. You can't give that right away.

Before closing, ask the HOA for an estoppel certificate. That's its signed statement of what the seller owes and what comes with the home. It must list the dues and whether they're paid, and any special assessments. It must list open rule violations, and whether the board has to approve you.

It also has to say if a fee is due at the sale. Some HOAs charge each new owner a fee, called a capital contribution or a transfer fee. Those fees are easy to miss.

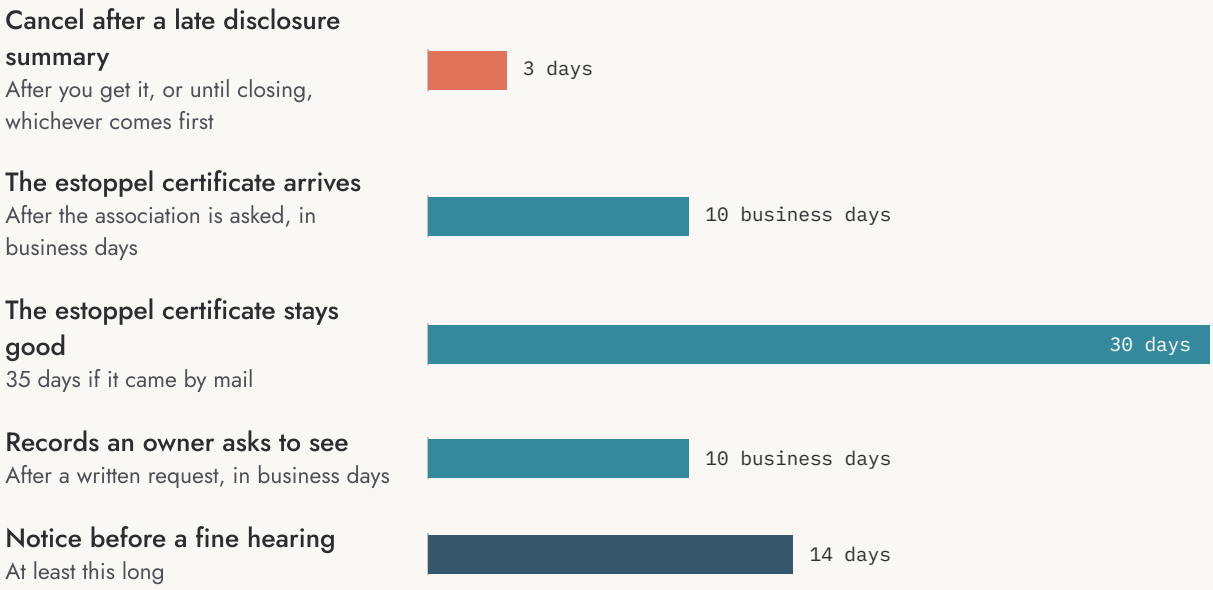

Here's why it matters. A new owner can be made to pay what the seller left unpaid, dues and special assessments alike. But a buyer who relies on the certificate can't be charged more than it says.

Once asked, the HOA has 10 business days to issue it. It stays good for 30 days, or 35 if it came by mail. Order it early, and read it before closing day.

FIG. 05 · THE CLOCKS

How many days each clock gives you

06

Getting the documents, in order

The documents are easier to get than they used to be. Here's where they live, and the order to ask for them.

Since January 1, 2025, an HOA with 100 or more lots must keep its documents on a website or app. That means the covenants, the rules, the budget, the financial reports, the insurance and the meeting notices. They sit behind a login for owners.

Every HOA also had to give each owner a copy of its rules and covenants by October 1, 2024. After a change, it must send out a new copy.

You're not an owner yet, so ask the seller to pull the set. An owner who asks in writing must be allowed to see the records within 10 business days.

If the home is a condo, there's a second set of documents about the building itself. Our condo guide covers them.

FIG. 06 · THE CHECKLIST

Seven things to ask for before you make an offer

Go in order. Each step helps with the next one.

- [ ] 01 This year's budget and the latest financial report
  From the association, through the seller. Look for the reserve lines.
- [ ] 02 The reserve study, if there is one
  Read it next to the budget.
- [ ] 03 The tax bill for the exact parcel
  Manatee or Sarasota tax collector. Find the district's two lines.
- [ ] 04 The covenants, the rules and the manual
  Rentals, parking, fences, paint, pets.
- [ ] 05 The disclosure summary, before you sign
  If it comes late, you have 3 days to cancel.
- [ ] 06 The estoppel certificate, ordered early
  The association has 10 business days. Read it before closing.
- [ ] 07 Any fee due at the sale
  A capital contribution, resale or transfer fee. It's on the certificate.
